

We will take lie detector test say Kate and Gerry McCann

Sept 21, 2007 (updated May 8, 2013)

THE PARENTS of Madeleine McCann are prepared to take a lie detector test to prove their innocence.

Friends say Kate and Gerry McCann want to show they have nothing to hide over the disappearance of the four-year-old who went missing on a family holiday to Portugal in May.

The couple's decision is the latest stage in a high-profile fightback led by family and friends against police suspicions they may be responsible for Madeleine's death and staged an elaborate cover-up.

The McCanns were declared official suspects by detectives two weeks ago after DNA traces in a car hired after her disappearance were used to suggest the vehicle had been used to carry Madeleine's body.

The couple have returned to Britain and have been told that police do not have enough evidence to justify interviewing them again.

But they remain suspects and say they are determined to clear their names and continue the search for Madeleine who they believe may be still alive.

A friend said: "If they are asked to take a lie detector test by police they would. Kate and Gerry are happy to do anything that will clear their names."
